Crescent City Man Tells of Great Indian Battle

When Pat Hennessy, the freighter whose tracks were blundered by Indians near Wichita in the early days, was slain on the same hills, killed by Indians near the site of the small town where his home Oklahoma town that now bears his name is the people. Pat Hennessy, three companions, whose names we might know had the Indians few now know, also lost their lives, not far from the place. The three But the death of Hennessy, who continues rare for these days, was burned at a wagon wheel, he averted him from the scene of the known by nearly every westerner Hennessy's tragic end and the while few even know that three fell down.

These forgotten bits of the southwest's history were given by M. F. Kelso of Crescent, who was a digger out of Wichita in the Indian country. He was a trail driver on his way to Fort Reno when he was reached him at the San Park crossing west of Round Rock of the Indians of Tennessee and his comrade. He saw another party of Indians of which he was one. He ditched from their wagons and made off in the brush as fast as they could. He found that H. P. Malalley, a cowman of Round Rock, was the first to witness the scene of Hennessy's tragic fight for life. The man found the charred remains of the burning freighter. He had been tied to a wagon wheel, says and lay stacked around him and set fire to the blood thirsty Indians he thinks.

After the Indians were rounded up United States troops some of them told part of the tale. They said that Hennessy's companions were shot from the wagon in which they laid their rifles, and were forced to run for it. Hennessy well up, shot down Indian after Indian as they tried to come up on him over a cliff. He worked his repeating rifle until a shell struck and took the bushes closed in. A pile of empty cartridges showed what a fierce fight he fought for his life. Diners should worry.

The three companions fled north and were overhauled about ten miles away and shot down. Their three graves were for years landmarks beside the trail where it curved to cross a ravine. Kelso thinks that had they separated one or two of them would have gotten away to tell the story. Hennessy's grave was a hollowed place for freights. Kelso says that nearly every time he drove past it he would stop, sit in the mound, and pilgrimage on it. The freights hauled

HOFFMAN SAYS COMPULSION IS NEXT ARMY MOVE

ENFORCED MILITARY SERVICE ISURE TO COME; PRESENT LAW WON'T DO

Oklahoma City, June 7.—The United States might as well begin to think about compulsory military service for the new army, for fails to produce the desired results, conscription is sure to follow." This advice and the suggestion that the Officers of the Oklahoma national guard.

"Preparedness still demands in the nation," he said yesterday, "and we can't get it in one way or another."

It is preposterous to believe that, whatever this state will be able to supply the known men that will be required for its national guard in five years. On an average basis, that the total would require 1,000 men in each of the eight regiments. However, inducements offered in the new act were not enough just to satisfy the congressional demand," General Hoffman added.

First Year Requirements.

Under the provisions of the law Oklahoma must have a guard of 2,000 men in 1917. As the enlisted strength is now about 1,000, it is believed that the 1,000 additional men needed can be recruited in twelve months.

Nearly $1,000,000 of government money will be spent in the state initially when the federal law becomes fully operative. It was estimated by Colonel Hoffman. Beginning July 1 enlisted men will receive one-quarter of the regular army pay while in military service in the field. Captains will get $300 a year each, first lieutenants $250, and second lieutenants $200.

$480,000 In Pay.

If the enrollment reaches 2,000 men, their pay will amount to about $1,000,000 a year. The total amount to be spent by the national government in this state will approach the million-dollar mark when in the past added appropriations for transportation, subsistence and supplies for the annual idea comes, he said.

The state will provide horses for its cavalrymen under the new law, said Colonel Hoffman. In the past the expenses of maintenance has prevented purchase of horses. In the future the United States will pay for their forage.
